

Michael Collyer

Department of Biology

- Research in my lab focuses on the ecological and evolutionary morphology of vertebrates, and development of quantitative methods for analyzing phenotypic change. We are especially interested in understanding how – often human-influenced – local ecological changes affect the phenotypic evolution of organisms. My students typically work on research projects that have implications for the management and conservation of rare or endangered species.